(From the Ohio State Journal.) THE PRESIDENT'S DREAM. BY BLOCUM SLUGS, EEQ.

It was a chilly night in March, and o'er the Capitol. The darkness hung, in endless mass, like some vast sable pall; Potomac's foaming waters dashed along the ice bound shore. While now and then, a gust arose, with loud and angry rear. The signal of the midnight hour, throughout the city

And hushed in calm forgetfulness, was all the busy That daily bustle through the streets, and fill the marts of trade--

Save one-the grateful call of sleep, his eyes had not Alone, within the White House, sat the Nation's

THE PET OF THE FORECASTLE.

The tale I lay before you is no -omance -the facts have actually occurred some ten years since on board of a Boston Indiaman.-I was then young to the life of a sailor, and each scene at the time witnessed, is easier brought to mind than the occurrences of "the last voyage." Never, in the eyes of her crew, was there a craft that could compete with her, though so rapid and many have been the improvements since, that, in sober truth, could she be placed side by side with a ship of the present day, our opinions would be overreled. Of her master, never better man broke bread or trod shoe leather: one of the old school, he was both sailor and gentleman, neither were her officers wanting in those qualities which endeared them to those under their command-and there were sterling old tars in her forecastle, who, in the very sense of the word, belonged to her; voyage after voyage found them still in the same ship, at the same station, growling, sailor like, for the same imagined cause, and denouncing in round terms some fixture, which for half a doz-The contest had been sanguine and severe, full well en years, they daily had pronounced worthy a situation in tophet.

Don't imagine these warm wishes resulted in any ill feeling; 'twas but sailors character-He slept--but still his reverie as when in waking istics--for did the new comer dare to look ugly when they condemned, the old salts would raise a breeze directly.
